Poetry.

An Autumnal Rhyme. BY M. LOUISA CHITWOOD. Now that the brown tooks of October, Are white with the frost, My heart goeth back like a pilgrim, To Autumn's lyng lest

'Tis not that the dreamy night-shadows Rest soft on my brow, That, on the wild billows of pusion, My heart rocketh now.

'Tis not that the sweet lips around me, Are brimful of tune, For I would go out from this gladness,

And thre' the dim eyes of remembrance. I fondly would gaze, Away in the love-haunted distance, Of dim yesterdays.

I see by the white sanded river, With tears in my eyes, A calm home, quiet and lovely, Before me arise.

The ruddy light lies on the shutters, And closed is the door. For she who once sat by the hearth-stone, Will be there no more.

The asters rise up in the garden, In blue and in red. In every nook, golden with sunshine, Sleep Summer's young dead.

Anon I can hear in the pauses, Of doves as they call, Away in the gloom of the orchard, The ripe apples fall. And then I go up to the maple,

That stands on the kill-

Ah there is the place where my heartstri For there in the quiet October, They laid one away,
Whose little grave folds a black curtain,
All over the day.

And once more I gaze on the cottage, And every path where I have rambled, With her by my side.

In erchard and meadow and garden, Wherever I rove, Her merk eyes are gazing upon me, With looks full of love.

Oh! when the brown locks of October, Are whitened with frost, My heart in its wildest devotion,

For often the star shining curtains, Are softly let down, And blessings descend on my forehead

And rest like a crown. This is why I go out in my sadness, And earnestly gaze, Away to the love-haunted distance,

This is why of all the rice seasons, That smile on the year, The Autumn is best for it bringeth,
